00864

1962/10/28

5/5 - Cul More
1 / 124/12

October 28, 1962

TO: The Secretary

The Under Secretary

S/P - W. W. Rostow

FROM:

SUBJECT: Forward Implications of the Cuban Crists for Planning Tasks re the Soviets.

G - The Deputy Under Secretary

I commend to you this thoughtful memorandum of Mose Harvey's.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE	IS, FPC, CDR Date: 1,3,52
RELEASE DECLASSIFY  DECLASSIFY  DECLASSIFY  DECLASSIFY  REPART	MR Cases Only:  EQ Citations
( ) DELETE Non-Responsive Info FOIA Exemptions PA Exemptions	( ) CLASSIFY as ( ) S or ( ) C OADR ( ) DOWNGRADE TS to ( ) S or ( ) C OADR

WWRostow:rln

Catober 28, 1962

lu: :--- i. i. Rostov

PROF: Hose Harvey

তেন্তাল্যাঃ Forward Implications of the Cuban Crisis for Planning Tasks re the Soviets

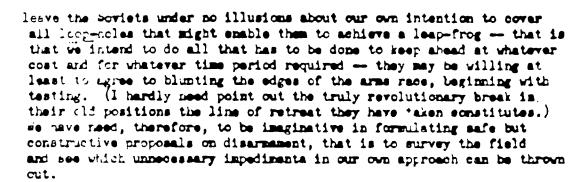

1. The Armanete Problem. Assumption by the Soviets of the rises and costs of the Cuben venture must be read as strong evidence that (a) our intelligence estimates of Soviet inferiority in long rarge delivery capability have been currect, and (b) the seviet leaders are arxicus to offset this balance as quickly as possible. With regard to this offsetting problem, they may have been concerned to strengthen their hand for a serlin ploy. It would be unvise, however, to assume this was their scle objective. It would seem probable they wanted ches; ... and quickly to improve their ever-all position. Cube may have beer simply a stop-gap pending Soviet catching up in ICbN's; it may have been a hoped-for permanent substitute for massive numbers of 10384 (i.e., a means of insuring an all-round pay-off or the presumed earlier decision to place prime emphasis on IRBM and Mucht's); it may have been a nulcing operation to cover Soviet weakness while it continued to seek a means of leap-frogging the necessity of developing a massive ICBF ca, ability.

It can hardly be assumed failure will result in the Soviet leaders becoming reconciled to their inferiority. I would think the reverse, that trey will now be more anxious than ever to get themselves in a "position of strength".

we consequently have more urgent meed than ever to stay on top of the weapons development problem. Any simple surmise that the Sovieta will not bear great stresses and strains to get into a position of real equality, or superiority if at all possible, would be highly dangerous.
The (uban effort would seem a direct refutation of this. Moreover, to the there compulsions that were previously operating on them has now been added that of accepting a great and humiliating defeat. We must, therefore, take out all the insurance we can to be sure there is no leapfrog.

Conversely, we should not close our eyes to possibilities of progress in armoments control. Assuming we do whatever is necessary to leave

2. garlin. The unsuccessful test of our resolve in the Cuban crisis would make it seem unlikely that the Soviets will want to mount another orisis which would again put them in a position where it will have to accept war or teck down. We would seem, therefore, to have good prospects of getting Serlin put on ice, and procably on conditions that would restore more normal conditions between mast-berlin and west-merkin. We might even be able to get the wall down, or at least to get its rigidities relaxed. Perhaps we will have to do this under cover of a severate Soviet-East German peace treaty that would not affect any of our rights.

The planning problem on Berlin is, then, to work out a program of negotiations on Berlin that will insure our getting what we want, but will show accessed on our part insofar as unessentials are concerned.

3. Cuba. It may well be that Khrushchev's decision to abandon the bases in Cuba will end up being a decision to abandon Cuba. Initially, Moscow will probably seek to play the theme that it has insured the "independence of "uba" which was its "only objective" all along. But Khruskchev can hardly see where any money is to be made in Cuba in the light of the firmness with which we dealt with the bases. Continued large-scale help may consequently be viewed as a profitless undertaking, from the standpoint of both Cuba and Latin America generally.

The planning task we face is to check out the above possibility and, to work out a follow-up in Cuba that will maximise the prospect of getting rid of Castro once and for all. Tur concentration should, of course, to on the Cuban people themselves. With the Soviet backdown, Castroism should increasingly be viewed as bankrupt, as offering nowhere to go but downward. Reestablishment of normal relations with the US and other American states will necessarily seem increasingly attractive.

4. Communist Chine. The Soviet backdown, as well as any improvements in atmospherics that may follow, will have a devastating impact on sino-soviet relations. This may not be apparent initially. It is conceivable, in fact, that initially the Soviet backdown will be ented by a Paiping retreat, in the first instance in the conflict with India. But basically the Soviet performance should turn out something of a last straw to the Uniness. The repercussions should not stop with warsening relations between the two, but should renerate added pressures for a change in basic orientation of the regime, (i.e., pressures to go down the litoist track). There might first, of course, be a new try at bail-out through some irrational approach, but this would almost inevitably turn out counter-productive in the end, increasing rather than reducing the changes of an ultimate basic change.

Our planning need is, therefore, to get going with a refinement and modification of our China policy that will be designed to maximise the chances of getting the Chinese Communist problem better in head.

- 5. General Responsised of Where the Soviete Stand. We have two broad possibilities of what the future may bring:
- The khrushchev leadership may have resorted to the Cuban venture in the hope of quickly and cheaply recouping from the setback they have in fact suffered and as a means of putting themselves in a better position to push forward again. Cub may, in other words, have been a last ditch try to get shough out of their post-Sputnik offensive to keep the ball rolling or at least to keep it from slipping downhill. Juba naving failed, the leadership may now to propared to modify such tantially their intentions and expectations regarding the cold war. They may be prepared, in simplest terms, to have a go at genuine co-existence.
- The leadership may have thought Cube would constitute a leap-frog. This not having happened, they may simply redouble their efforts to redress the power balance through more coetly but surer efforts at home. They may thus seek a quieting of tensions pending the results of a further arms build-up.

In developing our policy, we should assume the first of these possibilities, but safeguard against the second.

To capitalize on a possible Soviet basic reappraisal of the marits of continuing at this stage active prosecution of the cold war, we need to drive for arrangements that will improve the free world position at the various erisis points noted above and in other ways, that is, to nail down and draw maximum benefit from the Soviet retreat. In order, nowever, to minimize the chances of the second possibility (a Soviet girding of loins), we need to take care to do whatever we can in the way of atmospheries. We obviously have no need to consider consessions that would cost us maything. But we should guard against at unnecessarily "rubbing their noses in it".

The basic problem lies in this: We can afford to operate on the basic assumption that the Soviet Union is a second class power, but we should recognize the great difficulty the Soviet leadership will have in accepting such a role in a fully undisguised form. Atmospheries, shill fully brought to bear, can in this circumstance be of decisive importance.

elements is the soviet leadership, perhaps including the military, are copy sed to anything more than a passing "bowing to the wind". That the Culan venture was undertaken at all adds weight to this possibility. Acreover, the strange performance re "the Khrushchev letters" suggest both differences and arguments within the leadership, and gives at least some reason to believe that a "hard" group may have at one point sold or forced a last go at prolonging risks to try to salvage something from the operation.

but in another way, the basic problem we now face is to attempt to capitalise on the turn of events (and here I have in mind not just the Cuban incident but the entire preceding trend of events) by going for a beginning of a liquidation of the cold war. For this we should exploit the victory we have gained not alone through seising and mailing down redoubts from which we can better press the Soviets in the future, but also through making every effort to convince the Seviets of the intrinsic futility and pursuessariness of the hestile course which they have pursued since the end of the war.

The planning challenge is that we devise policies that will maximise the chances of transforming a great particular victory into a historic turn in the whole course of post-war world relations.

6, All of the above involves, of course, planning tasks and efforts over a very long period. It is essential, however, that we keep in mind the problems posed from the very first. From this point on, any slight bend in the twig can have great moment for the direction of future growth.

CU: Mr. Guen Mr. Ransey

Mr. Lindley Staff Circulation

Mr. Jorden